

THE MYSTICAL MOON

Sanya K. S

Gazing at the sky,

I see the moon.

The moon, so lonely,

Providing his light to keep the darkness away.

Not only from the city but also from the hearts,

The hearts filled with anxiety, helplessness, cries.

The hearts which are broken, which have no hope,

The hearts that are full of fear and fright.

Him, with his picturesque smile,

Brightening lives and pulling people together,

People who are meant to be.

The Pascha full surrounded by stars,

Stars so vague unpunctual, tiny yet massive.

I wonder what they'd do up there,

So many in number yet tranquil and still.

And he has no one to share,

His conundrums and stews.

LILY

Though never says a thing cause' it's his word against theirs.

He serenely observes everyone

Understands what they're going through cause' he was there once.

When no one cared, when no one saw,

And never appreciated his splendor.

But now that he's visible to their eyes,

They admire him, they exalt him,

Because of that pan am smile he puts on.

His inside filled with sorrow and melancholy,

Forlorn to see the girls crying for help in the darkness,

The boys being told not to sob and lead their families,

The kids traumatized by their parents' scraps,

The students jumping off to end their stress.

He sees them all from far away,

Yet couldn't find a way, to make them stay.

The faint young moon,

Shining bright yet dark inside,

Surrounded by stars yet a feeling of lonesome,

Seeing the misery yet cannot help.

We see ourselves in the moon,

A place where we all have dwelt.
